Contrast sensitivity (CS) and visual acuity (VA) have been assessed in one randomly chosen eye of 57 normally sighted subjects of three age groups: 21-35, 45-60 and 65-80 years. Contrast sensitivity was measured using a Pelli-Robson chart in a two-alternative forced-choice paradigm. Visual acuity was assessed using a Landolt C chart, with a target size of 0.9 degrees at a distance of 1.5 m. To determine the relationship of CS and VA to age, for each subject the mean CS and VA values for each age group were analysed. The results show that CS increases, and VA decreases, with age. The mean CS values of all age groups were almost constant between 1 and 0.2, the threshold contrast, whereas the mean VA values decreased continuously with increasing contrast from 1 to 0.2. The present data indicate that CS and VA measurements should be obtained with equal contrast levels to make a valid comparison. The present data could be used as a normative range for CS and VA.
