Technologies like these are now commonplace in professional sports and they could be a defining element for simulations like FIFA on consoles. “For a computer game to be able to truly simulate football,” said Gregg Berhalter, technical director for EA Sports, “you have to understand how football is played. To understand football, you need to be able to really simulate the sport. You need to be able to demonstrate, through simulation, how someone like Xabi Alonso, or another player, moves around the pitch in real life. HyperMotion technology gives us the ability to do that.” EA Sports, though, is far more than a tech company. It’s the largest developer and publisher of sports video games. For Xbox One, it’s one of the two dozen primary development studios on the platform. Its newest title, FIFA 17, generated over 80 million sales globally, made about $4.5 billion in EA’s fiscal year and is the top-selling game in EA history. Berhalter joined EA in October of 2010. He previously served as technical director for Project Spark and as technical director for NBA 2K series. He is an avid footy fan who grew up in the Bay Area cheering on the San Jose Earthquakes. EA Sports and PC Gamer: an interview GameSpot: How has the transition been to technical director for FIFA, a role that has a lot of responsibility for gameplay and matchmaking? Gregg Berhalter: When Gregg first joined the studio, he came to us and said, “I’m coming in to learn the business. I’m coming in to learn where we’re going with the business. But I also came in to learn about the technical stuff.” And we have learned about the technical stuff over the last three years. I joined at a point where our EA Sports Soccer games were averaging something like 400 hours of play time. So, we had a very deep technical team there that had been working on these soccer games for a long time. But we are now averaging something like 7,000 hours of play time. That’s not to say that we don’t have those people, but the breadth of the technical team that we now have is substantially larger. The one thing that was very important to Gregg when he came in, from day one, was he wanted to understand the business. He came

What's new in Fifa 22:

- New Play Styles Superstar Ball Skills lets you play the way you want. You can dribble past your defender with ease, slot a cross into the biggest winger in the world, or head the ball with the precision you expect from EA SPORTS. All with the usual controller feel, but with an armband that lets you execute even the most casual of Superstar goal-based moves.

- More celebrations. Celebrate goals, get a headbutt in celebration, and use your teammates to your advantage as you take on the opposition in the most authentic in-game celebration mechanics in FIFA. If you want to get a player over the wall, or want to feed them the ball to get them a goal, there are plenty of ways to make your fans go wild!
- If you dare to take on us! FIFA 22 introduces the new Powerwall system for both goalkeeper and defenders, so you can defend or attack from the front or back, or trap the ball with the highest speed and acceleration possible, or even try and flip the ball up, up and away from goalkeepers. Brace yourselves for the barrage of new and enhanced defensive collisions, fast paced action, masterful dribbling, and potentially a figure 8 windup from a goalkeeper.
- New Goalkeepers - Facing on-pitch pressure from keepers who want to steal your thunder, FIFA 22 showcases some of the most flexible goalkeepers in the world, using a new special face-of-wall motion capture to allow you to conduct your own shootout. Take on the Realsports 7-per-9 rating system to see if your goalkeeper can show up and make you pay. Or take your keeper to the next level with new 5-figure ratings and all-new goalkeeping skills like a power dive or headfake penalty.
