The authors describe a case of opiate dependence treated with a novel treatment procedure, which combines a contingency management (CM) approach with cognitive behavioral treatment. The key components of the CM approach included social support and contingency contracts for positive drug use. The drug-positive reward was an experimental drug, oral hydromorphone, administered to the patient in daily doses of.4 to.5 mg. We present the patient's clinical response to the procedure and results of a follow-up interview. The patient also received traditional treatment, including methadone and counseling. The results of the follow-up interviews suggest that patients who enter treatment after participation in a CM-based treatment program may not exhibit a significant risk for relapse.
