In humans, many risk factors for community-acquired pneumonia have been identified, and they are helpful for identifying which patients are at higher risk of developing severe disease. However, this information is lacking for dogs and cats, despite the large impact of this type of disease on the economy of the canine and feline veterinary profession and on pet owners' health. Data from the records of 959 dogs and 775 cats hospitalized in a small animal clinic were analyzed retrospectively to evaluate the influence of many clinical and epidemiological factors on the prevalence of pneumonia during the year 2003. Forty-five percent of the dogs and 40% of the cats studied had pneumonia, the most frequent etiologic agent was Streptococcus zooepidemicus. Age and neutering status were statistically associated with pneumonia. The risk factors associated with the development of severe disease in dogs and cats included the following: presence of chronic disease, diarrhea, cardiovascular disease, stress and immun
