Background/introduction ===== Tumor tissue is known to release a vast variety of factors that influence its microenvironment, and these factors play a pivotal role in tumor angiogenesis. We have previously demonstrated that the vasculature of glioma and carcinoma tissue can influence cancer cell proliferation. Consequently, it is possible that the factors released by the tumor's vasculature, such as microRNA, may play an important role in regulating tumor growth and/or the development of vascularized tumors in a paracrine manner. Methods ===== In this study, we demonstrate that microRNA-451 can modulate tumor angiogenesis and tumor growth. We evaluated the role of this microRNA by performing in vitro and in vivo analyses. Briefly, we first evaluated the potential of microRNA-451 to modulate tumor angiogenesis using a panel of human umbilical vein endothelial cells (HUVECs) in different models of angiogenesis. We subsequently evaluated the effects
