I would say Lightroom is a worthy upgrade over Lightroom 4.x, but there are many downsides as well. The biggest problem is Lightroom's use of disk space. The native resolution is enormously higher than Photoshop's. While this is great for creating prints, it also has a few disadvantages. Lightroom 5 adds a few megabytes (and it's not always for the better) and eats up more hard drive space when you are using it and is also slower. Lightroom 5 also has a slightly aggressive file compression. It allows you to make use of the lossless options if you like. I especially like and appreciate the option to disable normal compression when saving movie clips, PSD files, and pictures. Lightroom 5's file compression functions and allows you to use LZMA on movies, as well as it has a new and improved proxy profile, but it is still not as good as the best proxies in Photoshop, Illustrator, and After Effects. Plus, Lightroom 5 doesn't fully support the cloud. The offline editing features are still limited, too. If you aren't a designer or an admin (which I apologetically am not) then you won't get much out of this. It's great for screen printing (if you engage the alt mode instead of a moving mouse) and it's also a good printer driver. You can even convert video files into Photoshop files so you can peel away the video information and either get a better understanding of the files you're dealing with or better print it out. The smartphone app really is stellar, and is a great online proof tool too.

As the workday demands more and more of your attention, the need for a system that makes filing email easy, browsing email fast, and organizing emails into folders becomes even more vital. But it's not always possible to rely on human memory to help get back to email. That's where things start to fall apart. Some email programs suggest ideas for folders, but it can be hard to remember where you saved those emails, and even harder to create new folders if you don't remember where you saved them.
